Additionally, the Warrior Foundation provides immediate financial assistance to special operations personnel severely wounded so their loved ones can be bedside during their recovery.

Why Special Operations Personnel: Since the terrorist attacks in 2001, America has demanded much of its elite Special Operations Forces. Special Operations Forces consist of some 60,000 Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps – active and reserve – who are organized into a variety of land, sea, aerospace forces, including Army Special Forces and Rangers, Navy SEALs, Air Force special operations squadrons and Marine Corps special operations personnel. Operating in more than 26 countries around the world, Special Operations Forces have taken the lead role in the war against terror. But in return, the sacrifices and casualties incurred by Special Operations personnel have been significantly high.

History: The Special Operations Warrior Foundation began in 1980 as the Col. Arthur D. "Bull" Simons Scholarship Fund. The Bull Simons Fund was created after the Iranian hostage rescue attempt to provide college educations for the 17 children surviving the nine special operations men killed or incapacitated at Desert One. It was named in honor of the legendary Army Green Beret who repeatedly risked his life on rescue missions. In 1995, several charitable organizations merged to form the Special Operations Warrior Foundation.

Organization: The SOWF is governed by a Board of Directors (up to 25 members), which consults with a Board of Advisors. The Board of Directors has four standing committees: Executive, Development, Audit & Finance, and Governance. The SOWF office is located four miles from MacDill AFB, the home of the United States Special Operations Command. The Foundation has seven full-time employees: President/CEO, Executive Director, Educational & Family Services Director, Public Relations Director and three Administrative Assistants.

Challenge: With more than 100 children eligible for college each year, the Foundation's financial need, determined by a professional Actuarial corporation, is $76 million. The Foundation currently has $24 million in their investment portfolio.
